Fund managers' commentary

What can be said of the third quarter? For a sterling investor, one of the best performing assets was US sovereign debt – for instance, the 5-year Treasury Bill delivered returns approaching 11%. Also for the sterling investor, one of the worst performing assets was the UK sovereign debt market (also known as the gilt market) which delivered losses approaching 20% depending on what part of the curve your investments are in. During the quarter, sterling depreciated significantly and this can explain a great deal of the performance of the T-Bill. But, as a sterling investor, investing in a sterling based asset, the movement of the currency shouldn't be a factor in explaining a near 20% fall, but it is most certainly a contributing factor. Prices move up and down due to supply and demand. At the moment there is a lot of supply of gilts – with more to come – and not a lot of demand....

Capital markets are global instruments; they move to the beat of the global drum and at the moment, the UK is in the eye of the storm – it has high inflation, rising interest rates, huge pressures surrounding energy prices and weak political leadership which is causing uncertainty in the investment community. A mini budget that wasn't a mini budget was widely hated by the markets and led to a collapse in the gilt market. Sterling followed suit and almost reached parity with the US Dollar and the Euro. A partial U-turn quickly ensued, but for a new Prime Minister and Chancellor to openly deny ownership of the issues it doesn't look good. It is often said that the best time to invest is when there is blood on the streets, and we are probably too early to call the bottom, but are we approaching the nadir? This year has not been kind to investors – capital markets are dynamic and complex and don't always make sense in the short-term.

Markets were volatile; China and Hong Kong were much weaker; Property securities suffered; and UK Small cap didn't fare well either. Emerging Markets generally delivered positive returns (also potentially benefitting from a strong US Dollar).

It feels like there is change underway in the valuation of capital markets as the world adjusts to operating in a higher interest rate and inflation environment. The winners and losers of the next decade are unlikely to be the same as this most recent decade – this will create opportunities.
