Monthly Commentary

What happened in financial markets?

The US market underperformed again in March as the prospect of tariffs and a potential trade war came to the fore, alongside softer US economic data. The S&P 500 returned -8%, while US smaller companies fell -8.5%. Other regional markets were more insulated but also fell, with Europe, Japan, and the UK falling between 2-3%. Global infrastructure, a traditionally defensive sector, fell by less than 1%.

Very few assets rose over the month as investors digested the implications of a tariff-induced global slowdown and the prospect of inflation rearing its head once again. Even government bonds, which usually provide a safe haven during periods of uncertainty, struggled to offset the weakness encountered in equity markets. The FTSE World Government Bond Index fell 0.5% and UK gilts fell 1%. The only bright spots were US treasuries which delivered a modestly positive return of 0.6%, and gold prices which rose 7.2%. All returns in GBP with bonds hedged to GBP.

What is the outlook?

It's too early to fully know the scope and impact of Trump's policy agenda, and in particular his strategy on tariffs and trade. If the US administration delivers tariffs on imports from its major trading partners, it's likely there will be negative effects on global growth and the odds of a global slowdown or recession will rise. Tariffs also have implications for inflation and interest rates, but at this stage we remain unconvinced that tariffs will be as inflationary as some economists suggest.

Tariffs aside, US growth forecasts have been revised lower as softer economic data has exacerbated concerns around AI spending and the de-rating in the Mag-7. We've also witnessed a rotation out of US assets to Europe and other regions with relatively more attractive valuations. Whilst we do not expect a US recession, we feel there are good reasons to add to government bonds and other defensive asset classes.
